DETAILS OF THE PROJECT

1. PROJECT BACKGROUND

Corrosion-fouling is common phenomena for ship hull and offshore structure. These problems pose billions of dollars to maritime industry. The annual cost of corrosion-fouling worldwide was estimated exceeding US$ 2.5 trillion in 2016, which translates to 3 to 4% of the Gross Domestic Product of industrialized countries. Recently, natural extracts and natural compounds derived from plants have been identified as an environmentally acceptable, readily available and renewable source for wide range of inhibitors. Effective formulations of corrosion-fouling will be developed by incorporating other additives. Corrosion-fouling inhibition will be evaluated by weight loss method, electrochemical measurements, surface analysis, and compare them with commercially available inhibitors. In addition to validate the obtained experimental results, computational studies will be carried out. Fundamental mechanism interaction of the compounds and physical interaction with epoxy metal will be investigated by means XRD, FTIR, SEM, TEM, EIS and morphological analysis. The corrosion and fouling progress will be monitored in seawater and acidic environments. Effect of temperature will also be studied. The proposed study is expected to introduce corrosion-fouling inhibitors which will be environment friendly and of low cost. This study offers an area for new knowledge and inventions addressing various aspects such as corrosion treatment and biological active components which may provide valuable innovation in maritime field. This study will be led by Universiti Malaysia Terengganu with the involvement of four other main parties namely Universiti Kebangsaan Malaysia (UKM), Rivers State University (RSU) and AISSMS College of Engineering, Pune, India (AISSMSCOE).

Abstract

Corrosion poses a significant challenge in our daily lives across various mediums, conditions, and factors. Although there have been numerous studies and investigations on environmentally friendly corrosion inhibitors, the available data and evidence on the effectiveness of Piper betle extract as a corrosion inhibitor are still insufficient. In this study, we explored the potential of green inhibitors, specifically Piper betle extract, for inhibiting corrosion in HCl on aluminium alloy. Sequential maceration using Piper betle extract was employed, and a weight loss experiment was conducted by immersing the aluminium alloy in HCl for 24 hours at various concentrations. The corrosion products and microstructures were then characterized using Scanning Electron Microscopy (SEM). The results obtained from this study, based on weight loss measurements, indicate a significant correlation between the inhibitory action and the amount of the inhibitor. However, our study found that the Piper betle extract inhibitor did not surpass the performance of the industrial inhibitor. When the concentration varied from 0 to 2500 ppm, the inhibition efficiencies of Piper betle extract and the industrial inhibitor increased up to 47% and 90%, respectively. Fourier Transform Infrared Spectroscopy (FTIR) revealed that hydroxylchavicol is the primary active compound in Piper betle extract, and the presence of aromatic hydroxyl compounds contributes significantly to the corrosion inhibition activity.

Conclusion

The Piper betle crude inhibitor demonstrates the characteristics of a mixed inhibitor for the corrosion of aluminium metal in 1.0 M hydrochloric acid (HCl). The weight loss measurements conducted under various concentrations of Piper betle extract indicate an inhibition efficiency of up to 47.0%. This suggests that the Piper betle extract exhibits effective corrosion inhibition properties for aluminium in the presence of HCl.

SEM analysis of the aluminium alloy surface reveals significant corrosion in the absence of inhibitor, while in the presence of Piper betle extract, the corrosion is minimized, indicating the formation of a protective film on the surface of the aluminium alloy. This indicates that the Piper betle inhibitor acts as a corrosion inhibitor and helps mitigate the corrosive effects of HCl on the aluminium alloy.

The corresponding Energy Dispersive Spectroscopy (EDS) spectrum confirms the presence of chloride atoms on the surface of the aluminium alloy, indicating the occurrence of corrosion. However, in the presence of the Piper betle inhibitor, the corrosion is reduced, suggesting the formation of a protective film that hinders chloride attack.

Fourier Transform Infrared Spectroscopy (FTIR) analysis reveals the presence of functional groups such as hydroxyl groups, aromatic compounds, and benzene groups in the Piper betle extract. These findings suggest the presence of flavonoids or related compounds in the inhibitor, which contribute to its corrosion inhibition properties.

ABSTRACT

The process of estimating wear rates for composites is nonlinear and complex. Artificial intelligence (AI)-based expert systems, such as artificial neural networks (ANNs) and fuzzy inference systems (FIS), possess several useful characteristics that make them suitable for modeling nonlinear systems. However, the accuracy of the ANN prediction is hindered if the input variables are unexpectedly altered. The Adaptive Neuro-Fuzzy Inference System (ANFIS) combines the adaptability and learnability of ANNs with the verbal expressions of the FIS. This study proposes an ANFIS sub-clustering-based prediction model for the abrasive wear rate of Polytetrafluoroethylene (PTFE), which is widely used in various applications. The experimental wear of the PTFE material was estimated by varying the load, speed, and sliding distance using in-house tribometer, and the extracted data was used to design an ANFIS model for wear prediction. The designed model was tested on a dataset that was not used to build the model. The regression analysis of the proposed model exhibited high prediction capability, with an R² value of 0.999 and a mean squared error of 0.39%.

CONCLUSIONS

In this work, an in-house Tribometer is utilized to conduct an experimental study of PTFE's tribological performance. In order to predict the wear rate for different loads, speeds, and sliding distances, an adaptive neuro-fuzzy model was developed using the collected experimental data. The following conclusions can be drawn from the analysis of the data collected and used in this study.

1. There is a direct relationship between the load, speed, and sliding distance that are inputs and the wear rate. At light loads and slow speeds, wear is reduced.
2. The specific wear rate can be predicted with a 98.99% degree of accuracy using ANFIS modelling, indicating that the predicted values of specific wear rate are in good proximity with the experimental values.
3. Finally, the response surface plot shows that the wear performance of the PTFE material can be improved by decreasing the sliding speed and normal load, respectively, to decrease wear loss.
